GOPers far and wide have lately noticed, and noticed, and n.o.t.i.c.e.d rising gas prices. They didn't squawk much about it when Dubya was president, but then they weren't trying to oust a president. Context has ch-ch-changed, and they're turning to face the strain - at the gas pump where they hope to refuel the GOP's faltering electoral strength. Their concern over rising prices, however, is highly selective. For example, health care cost inflation bothers them, but they prescribe solutions that will worsen it. And college cost inflation, well, Newt Gingrich noted in a November 2011 GOP Debate while discussing
